Negro Nurses to Receive Public Health Training

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 2.—The Lincoln School for Colored Nurses, New York City, is starting a program with the aim of providing adequate nursing service for Negroes in Northern communities. It is undertaking an intensive study of communities with large Negro populations to discover the extent of the nursing service needed. To meet the requirements revealed through this study all students at the school will in the future receive four months' training in public health service, including work in dispensaries and communicable disease hospitals and field work for the social service department of the hospital and for the Henry Street Settlement. Graduate courses in public health, pediatrics, midwifery, contagious diseases, surgical nursing and hospital administration are in contemplation, with a limited number of scholarships. A national placement and advisory service for Negro nurses is also to be instituted.
